Course Description:
The course assumes that there are many avenues to human knowing. As such, this course explores various scientific approaches to study the relationship between spirituality, religion and health making a reductionist assumption that scientific methodologies are superior to critical philosophic ways of knowing, feeling, and judging. Contributing to our understanding of religion and spirituality are institutional religious beliefs imbedded in historical oral traditions, written scriptures, liturgical rituals, organized works of charity, and legal authority structures. Finally, the course explores how individuals view spirituality and religion as they move through the life cycle, thereby integrating theories of human development.
